SETTLEMENT OF THE GREAT PLAINS AREA

The Great Plains area, long thought of as a desert, was the last large part of our country to be settled. When, at an earlier date, the well-watered lowlands of the Mississippi Valley were settled, the great herds of buffalo had moved west into the Great Plains. There they found wild grasses and water holes, where they could get the necessary drinking water, and there their numbers greatly increased. But hunters found them and they were slaughtered by the hundreds of thousands every year, until almost none were left.

The Days of the Cattle Kings and Cowboys. — Farther south in this same Great Plains area, cattle and horses that had been brought by Spanish explorers and settlers had escaped and found the grasslands north of the Rio Grande. They also increased in numbers. The Indians had long known how to catch, tame, and ride the horses. The white men who made their way into this country from Kentucky and Tennessee also knew how to catch and ride wild horses. There were so many of the long-legged, long-horned cattle, that they had little if any value. But some of the early settlers claimed great areas of land and many thousands of cattle (A). Each of these "cattle kings" hired "cowboys" to look after their cattle which grazed with those of other owners over the unfenced pastures. Later in your study you will read about cowboys and their work. With the passing of the buffaloes, the cattle followed the pasture lands northward, across the whole width of our country and into Canada.

Why and When. — Write out a brief statement telling why and when :

1. The Great Plains were called the Great American Desert.
2. The Great Plains area was a buffalo country.
3. The buffaloes disappeared and the area became a grazing area for great herds of long-horned cattle.
4. Later, changes were made in the cattle industries of this region.
